Course

Canyon Springs Golf Club is a true Hill Country course taking full advantage of the natural terrain. The course, designed by Thomas Walker, opened in 1998. Using an old farm to build on this choice piece of Texas real estate, this land has been artfully transformed into what many golfers will refer to as among the very best of what Texas has to offer. With five sets of tee boxes on each hole, demanding greens, natural Hill Country surroundings and magnificent limestone waterfalls on two holes, this 7,000-plus-yard course presents a significant challenge to even the most experienced golfers (and even those who think they are). The first hole is as welcoming as a roadside barbecue truck. It's short and downhill with lots of room. The way the young guys hit it these days, they could probably take aim at the green. But most are better off with a nice, smooth swing leaving a wedge in. Fairways are generous throughout the course, with pecan and oak trees lining some, while more links-inspired high grass lines others. The greens are especially interesting, some of which can be up to three clubs deep. For these holes, the GPS units on golf carts will come in handy often for pin locations and distances. The sixth hole is the most "designed" of the holes at Canyon Springs. This short par 4 has both left and right fairways and an extremely wide green at the top. The choice of which fairway to take will probably be dependent on where the flag is located, which you should be able to identify from the elevated tee. The sixth is a fun tee shot, but the best tee of the lot kicks off the back nine. The par-5 10th plays from a high tee up by the "Cliff Haus" (or halfway house to us non-Hill Country natives) and demands a long carry over a ravine to safety.
